It focuses on conceptual and ideological analysis, but it does so in continuity with the sciences, highlighting both the theoretical and empirical dimensions of politics. In this sense, this course complements other modules in political philosophy at NOVA FCSH that focus specifically on the history of political ideas. This module draws on the insights of subjects like philosophy, political science or economics. For this interdisciplinarity helps to grasp the complex problems arising in the modern world. By taking this course, students can thus learn how to analyse politics from different ideological, conceptual and disciplinary perspectives.
